Helping to Develop Feel for Distance in your Putting - April 2019

An important part of putting is to be able to send the ball approximately the right distance for the putt you are facing. If you feel you are already good with this, then this tip is probably not for you. But if you struggle with your distance, give the following practice exercises a try.

Generally I find that people who struggle with their distance, tend to move the putter in a firm, "controlled" type manner. I like my pupil's to experience that they can "control" the putter without needing the firmness, and without supposedly ideal technique. These practice exercises help the pupil experience softness in their technique and motion. For many golfers that I see, this softness is a key to developing a feel for distance.

1. One-Handed Putts.
Generally develops better using your trailing arm (right arm for right handed golfers). Be sure to have your arm and shoulder soft and your arm a bit bent.

3. Different Stance Putting.
However you want to vary it. The more you make it feel a bit awkward the better.

2. Tapping the balls around into a pile

Good Golfing,
